Abdulwahid A. Bidin

Abdulwahid A. Bidin (April 7, 1925 – February 2, 1999) was a Filipino jurist, former guerrilla fighter, and public servant who made history on January 12, 1987, when President Corazon C. Aquino appointed him as the 117th Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the Philippines, making him the first Filipino Muslim ever to sit on the Court since it was formally established on June 11, 1901.<ref name="wiki_bidin">Template:Cite web</ref><ref name="philstar2009">Template:Cite web</ref> That was nearly nine decades of constitutional crises, landmark rulings, and a court interpreting laws that affected millions of Muslim Filipinos, without a single Muslim voice among the magistrates.

Born in the stilt-house community of Sitangkai in the southernmost Sulu Archipelago, Bidin grew up navigating the complex intersection of maritime Sama culture, Islamic tradition, and the American colonial education system, a navigation that would define his entire professional life. He fought as a guerrilla against the Japanese occupation, earned a law degree from the University of the Philippines, served as an elected provincial board member, rose through the judiciary as a trial judge and appellate court justice, and eventually took a seat on the country's highest bench. Along the way, he built a record of principled, independent jurisprudence that continues to shape Philippine constitutional law today.

His most cited opinion, People v. Marti (G.R. No. 81561, 1991), remains the definitive Philippine authority on the private search doctrine. His dissent in Marcos v. Manglapus (G.R. No. 88220, 1989) stands as a principled defense of constitutional rights against executive overreach. And his work in Board of Commissioners (CID) v. Dela Rosa (G.R. Nos. 95122-23, 1991) reinforced due process protections in citizenship disputes. Beyond the written opinions, Bidin spent his career as a living proof that a devout Muslim from the Philippine south could serve at the very apex of a secular state, without compromising his faith, his community, or his judicial integrity. He retired in 1995 and passed away on February 2, 1999, but the standard he set, for excellence, independence, and principled engagement with the law, continues to resonate in Philippine legal circles.

Contents

1 Early Life and the Sulu Archipelago
2 World War II and the Anti-Japanese Resistance
3 Education at the University of the Philippines
4 Private Practice and Provincial Politics
5 The Judicial Career: From Zamboanga to the Court of Appeals
6 The 1987 Appointment: Making History on the High Bench
7 Landmark Decisions and Judicial Philosophy
    7.1 People v. Andre Marti (G.R. No. 81561, 1991): The Private Search Doctrine
    7.2 Marcos v. Manglapus (G.R. No. 88220, 1989): A Dissent for Civil Liberties
    7.3 Board of Commissioners (CID) v. Dela Rosa (G.R. Nos. 95122-23, 1991): Due Process and Citizenship
8 Expertise in Shari'ah and the Sarah Balabagan Mission
9 The Cultural Weight of Being 'First'
10 The Twenty-Six-Year Gap: From Bidin to Dimaampao
11 Commemoration and Academic Legacy
12 Death
13 Further Reading

14 See Also

Abdulwahid A. Bidin

Born	April 7, 1925 Sitangkai, Tawi-Tawi, Philippines
Died	February 2, 1999 (aged 73) Philippines
Nationality	Filipino
Religion	Islam
Ethnicity	Tausug-Sama
Education	University of the Philippines College of Law (Bachelor of Laws)
Fraternity	Alpha Phi Beta
Office	117th Associate Justice, Supreme Court of the Philippines
Appointed by	President Corazon C. Aquino
Term	January 12, 1987 – April 7, 1995
Preceded by	Lino Patajo
Succeeded by	Regino C. Hermosisima Jr.
Political affiliation	Grand Alliance (Progressive Party of the Philippines)
Awards	Most Outstanding Trial Court Judge, Integrated Bar of the Philippines, 1979

Early Life and the Sulu Archipelago

Abdulwahid A. Bidin was born on April 7, 1925, in Sitangkai, a municipality now part of Tawi-Tawi Province in the southernmost reaches of the Sulu Archipelago.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/> Sitangkai sits geographically closer to Sabah, Malaysia, than to Manila, and much of it is built on stilts above the shallow, coral-rich waters of the Celebes Sea. The place is often called "the Venice of the South" for how thoroughly its life revolves around the sea. Its people, the Sama Dilaut and neighboring island communities, had long looked outward to the broader Malay world and inward to the Islamic faith for their cultural and spiritual identity.

By the time Bidin was born, the Sulu Archipelago was under the full weight of American colonial administration. The "Moro Province" policy brought public schools, secular governance, and a deliberate cultural integration program to communities whose social and legal lives had been governed for generations by Shari'ah and by adat (customary law rooted in Islamic principles and local tradition). Growing up at this intersection, Bidin received his elementary education in Tawi-Tawi before moving to the provincial capital of Jolo for secondary schooling.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/>

Jolo was the commercial and intellectual heart of the southern Philippines: a city layered with Spanish and American colonial history, Malay trade connections, and the deep heritage of the Tausug Sultanate. For the young Bidin, relocating there was an early lesson in navigating cultural plurality. He learned to move between Sama and Tausug communities, between Muslim and non-Muslim peers, between customary authority and national regulation. That capacity to hold multiple frameworks simultaneously without being captured by any single one would become one of the most consistent features of his eventual legal career.

World War II and the Anti-Japanese Resistance

Like virtually every young Filipino of his generation, Bidin's youth was irrevocably shaped by the Japanese invasion and occupation, which began in late 1941. In the Southern Philippines, the occupation was met with fierce, organized guerrilla resistance, and Bidin chose to join it.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/> That choice was not a small one. In 1941, the relationship between the Bangsamoro people and the Philippine state was already complicated and contested. Questions of Muslim self-determination, land rights, and cultural recognition were longstanding fault lines in Philippine politics. Yet Bidin fought for the Philippine nation, fighting alongside Christian and Muslim guerrillas against the same occupier and for the same soil.

The war years left a lasting mark on his worldview. Having lived through the collapse of legal order, the brutality of occupation, and the moral imperatives of organized resistance, he emerged with a hard-won understanding of what the rule of law is designed to protect, and what happens to human society when it fails. That wartime experience would later inform a judicial temperament that was notably attentive to the fragility of rights and skeptical of any state tendency to accumulate power at the individual's expense. After Philippine independence was restored in 1946, Bidin's status as a veteran and his demonstrated intellectual promise made him eligible for a government scholarship to the University of the Philippines.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/>

Education at the University of the Philippines

The University of the Philippines College of Law in the late 1940s was a world unlike anything Bidin had grown up in. It was urban, predominantly Christian, shaped by American legal pedagogy, and populated largely by the children of established Luzon and Visayas families who would go on to dominate Philippine public life for decades. As a government scholar from the Muslim south, Bidin was, in the most direct sense, an outsider.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/>

He navigated this environment with the intellectual composure that would become characteristic of his entire career. During his time at UP, he became a member of Alpha Phi Beta, one of the university's most distinguished fraternities, which cultivated a deliberate culture of intellectual rigor and produced multiple Supreme Court justices and prominent figures in national public life.<ref name="apb">Template:Cite web</ref> Membership gave him entry into the networks of mentorship and professional connection that shaped Philippine law from the inside, a kind of integration that was both deliberate and demanding.

The legal curriculum Bidin mastered was grounded in the 1935 Constitution, explicitly modeled on American constitutionalism and layered over a civil law tradition inherited from Spanish colonial rule.<ref name="malacanang_journal">Template:Cite web</ref> He did not succeed in this environment by erasing who he was. He succeeded on his own terms, maintaining his religious and cultural identity as a Muslim from the southern Philippines while excelling in a legal tradition built around very different assumptions. Upon earning his Bachelor of Laws degree and passing the Philippine Bar Examination, he made a decision that set him apart from many of his contemporaries: he returned to Sulu.

Private Practice and Provincial Politics

Back in Sulu, Bidin's private legal practice brought him face to face, on a daily basis, with the friction between the national legal code and the customary systems of adat and Shari'ah that still governed land, marriage, inheritance, and commercial relations in the Muslim south.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/> This was not a theoretical exposure to legal pluralism. It was the lived texture of it: disputes where the applicable law was genuinely contested, where customary authority and state authority made competing claims, and where the lawyer had to be a translator as much as an advocate.

His growing reputation as a principled and effective advocate drew him into provincial governance. From 1956 to 1959, he served as an elected member of the Sulu Provincial Board, running under the banner of the Grand Alliance affiliated with the Progressive Party of the Philippines.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/> His three years on the Board gave him direct experience in local legislation and a close-up view of the socio-economic drivers fueling growing tensions in the Muslim south. The seeds of what would eventually become the Moro National Liberation Front and its armed campaign for Bangsamoro self-determination were being planted in communities experiencing land dispossession, political neglect, and cultural erasure during this period. Bidin saw this not as an outside observer but as an elected official with a direct responsibility to the affected people.

The Judicial Career: From Zamboanga to the Court of Appeals

In 1968, Bidin received his appointment as a trial judge in Zamboanga City, one of Mindanao's major commercial and administrative hubs.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/> It was no minor posting: Zamboanga carried a large, commercially active docket reflecting the full range of human conflict, from petty criminal matters to contested land titles involving competing traditional and statutory claims. Beyond his primary assignment at Regional Trial Court Branch 12, he also served as pairing judge at RTC Branch 13 (a special drug court), and at various points served as assisting judge in Basilan Province and acting presiding judge at the RTC of Bongao, Tawi-Tawi.

The national recognition he earned during these years reflected the quality of what he was doing with that workload. In 1979, the Integrated Bar of the Philippines awarded him the distinction of Most Outstanding Trial Court Judge, a peer-assessed honor evaluated on integrity, legal acumen, and case management.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/> Receiving that distinction while operating in a high-volume, high-pressure jurisdiction during the martial law era, when the judiciary was under sustained political pressure from the Marcos administration, speaks to something more than technical competence. It speaks to character.

In 1983, he was elevated to the Intermediate Appellate Court (now the Court of Appeals), bringing him to Manila in an official judicial capacity for the first time.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/> The appellate work allowed him to develop the broader jurisprudential perspective that would characterize his Supreme Court tenure: carefully researched, clearly written opinions attentive to both the doctrine at stake and the real-world implications for the parties before the bench.

The 1987 Appointment: Making History on the High Bench

The People Power Revolution of February 1986 was more than a change of government. It was a mandate for institutional renewal. The Philippine judiciary had been systematically subordinated to executive will during the martial law years, and President Aquino moved deliberately to rebuild the Supreme Court's integrity, appointing jurists distinguished by their credentials, their independence from the old regime, and their diversity of background.<ref name="aquino_presidency">Template:Cite web</ref>

On January 12, 1987, Abdulwahid A. Bidin was appointed the 117th Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the Philippines, replacing Associate Justice Lino Patajo.<ref name="wiki_bidin"/> He was sixty-one years old. His mandatory retirement in 1995 would create the vacancy eventually filled by Regino C. Hermosisima Jr.<ref name="hermosisima">Template:Cite web</ref>

The historical significance of the appointment was immediately and widely recognized. For the first time in the Court's eighty-six-year history, a Filipino Muslim would sit among the fifteen magistrates charged with interpreting the nation's fundamental law.<ref name="philstar2009"/> That fact alone merited commemoration. But Bidin was not appointed to be a symbol. On any objective measure, he was among the country's most qualified jurists.

The Court he joined was operating at an extraordinary historical juncture. The 1987 Constitution, drafted by a commission convened by President Aquino and ratified by the Filipino people in February 1987, was a direct response to the Marcos era: an expanded Bill of Rights, stronger provisions for judicial independence, explicit recognition of the rights of cultural communities, and a substantially broader mandate for judicial review.<ref name="aquino_presidency"/> The Bidin Court was tasked with giving this new constitutional text its authoritative interpretation at the very moment when the entire democratic architecture of the Philippines was being rebuilt from the foundations.

For the Bangsamoro community, the appointment carried a weight that transcended institutional representation.<ref name="bangsamoro_gazette_dimaampao">Template:Cite web</ref> The twentieth-century Muslim Filipino experience had been marked by armed conflict, cultural suppression, and a well-founded sense of exclusion from the national project. Against that backdrop, a Tausug Muslim from Tawi-Tawi sitting on the country's highest bench was not a small thing. It signaled, for the first time at the very apex of the Philippine state, that Muslim Filipinos were full members of the republic: not subjects to be administered or problems to be managed, but citizens whose perspectives were essential to the interpretive work that a constitutional democracy requires.

Landmark Decisions and Judicial Philosophy

A justice's legacy ultimately rests on the written opinions they leave behind. By this measure, Bidin's eight-year tenure on the High Tribunal left a substantial and enduring mark.

People v. Andre Marti (G.R. No. 81561, 1991): The Private Search Doctrine

Of all the opinions Justice Bidin authored, People v. Andre Marti is the most frequently cited in Philippine law schools today.<ref name="marti">People of the Philippines v. Andre Marti, G.R. No. 81561, January 18, 1991. Full text at Template:Cite web</ref> The case arose in August 1987 when a man named Andre Marti brought four gift-wrapped packages to a forwarding agency in Ermita, Manila, declaring the contents as books, cigars, and gloves destined for Zurich. The agency's proprietor, Job Reyes, opened the packages before forwarding them to the Bureau of Customs, as was standard procedure, and found them packed with marijuana. Reyes reported the discovery to the National Bureau of Investigation, and Marti was charged under the Dangerous Drugs Act.

The defense argument was predictable: the search was unconstitutional. Article III, Section 2 of the 1987 Constitution guarantees the right of the people to be secure in their persons, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures. Marti argued that the evidence should be excluded.

Writing for the Court, Justice Bidin disposed of this argument with characteristic economy and precision. The constitutional protection against unreasonable searches and seizures, he held, is a restraint directed exclusively at the government, not at private individuals acting on their own initiative without government direction. Since the search had been conducted by Reyes, a private person, and not by a government agent, the evidence was perfectly admissible. The subsequent presence of NBI agents did not retroactively convert Reyes's independent action into a state-conducted search.

> The constitutional proscription against unlawful searches and seizures applies as a restraint directed only against the government and its agencies tasked with the enforcement of the law. It is not meant to be invoked against acts of private individuals.

The "state action" doctrine established by this decision had deep roots in American jurisprudence, but Bidin's ponencia gave it clear, authoritative, and accessible articulation in the Philippine context for the first time. Three and a half decades later, People v. Marti remains the go-to Philippine authority on this doctrine, cited in virtually every subsequent case involving searches conducted by private parties.<ref name="marti"/>

Marcos v. Manglapus (G.R. No. 88220, 1989): A Dissent for Civil Liberties

The constitutional drama of Marcos v. Manglapus unfolded against one of the most politically charged backdrops in Philippine history: the effort by Ferdinand Marcos and his family, then living in exile in Hawaii following the 1986 Revolution, to return to the Philippines. The Aquino government, citing national security concerns, refused to allow the return. The Supreme Court was asked whether the President had the power to bar a former head of state from returning to his own country.

The majority upheld the government's position, relying on the theory of "residual powers," executive powers not explicitly enumerated in the Constitution but implied by the functional demands of effective governance.<ref name="marcos_manglapus">Template:Cite web</ref> The majority reasoning was sophisticated, even persuasive in its policy logic. But it had a structural weakness: the explicit text of the Bill of Rights guarantees the right to travel, and overriding that textually grounded guarantee through unenumerated residual powers was, for the dissenters, a step the Constitution simply did not authorize.

Justice Bidin voted to grant the petition and allow the Marcoses to return. His position was rooted in strict constitutionalism: fundamental rights explicitly protected by the Bill of Rights cannot be curtailed without a specific, duly enacted law authorizing that curtailment, and no such law existed.<ref name="marcos_manglapus"/> Voting as he did required Bidin to prioritize his reading of the Constitution over both political prudence and institutional loyalty to his appointing authority. It was an act of genuine judicial independence, the kind that is easy to celebrate in the abstract and much harder to perform in practice.

Board of Commissioners (CID) v. Dela Rosa (G.R. Nos. 95122-23, 1991): Due Process and Citizenship

In Board of Commissioners (CID) v. Dela Rosa, Justice Bidin addressed the constitutionally sensitive intersection of citizenship claims, administrative jurisdiction, and the procedural guarantees of due process.<ref name="dela_rosa">Board of Commissioners (CID) v. Dela Rosa, G.R. Nos. 95122-23, May 31, 1991. Full text at Template:Cite web</ref> The case involved William Gatchalian, whose Filipino citizenship was challenged by the Commission on Immigration and Deportation, which sought to have him deported as an alien. The central question: could an administrative agency, rather than a court of law, have the final say over a substantive dispute about a person's citizenship?

Bidin's decision established a principle of lasting importance: when citizenship itself is at stake, the state is obligated to apply the highest standards of procedural due process, and the courts, not executive bodies, must serve as the ultimate arbiters of genuine citizenship disputes. An individual who has established a prima facie case of being a Filipino national cannot have that question finally resolved against him by an administrative body operating without full judicial process. The ruling provided meaningful protection against arbitrary administrative action and reinforced the post-1987 constitutional order's fundamental commitment to ensuring that no person is subjected to arbitrary deprivation of so fundamental a status as national citizenship.<ref name="dela_rosa"/>

Expertise in Shari'ah and the Sarah Balabagan Mission

One of the less-examined dimensions of Bidin's career is the depth and practical utility of his expertise in Islamic law, and the dramatic use to which that expertise was put almost immediately after his mandatory retirement from the Supreme Court on April 7, 1995. His mastery of Shari'ah was not peripheral to his professional identity; it was integral to it.

Presidential Decree No. 1083, the Code of Muslim Personal Laws of the Philippines, promulgated by President Marcos in 1977, had created a specialized legal framework for the Muslim community, governing matters of family law, inheritance, and personal status according to Shari'ah principles.<ref name="code_muslim_laws">Template:Cite web</ref> Bidin's fluency in both secular Philippine legal tradition and Islamic jurisprudence made him a uniquely valuable institutional asset, not just domestically but in the conduct of Philippine foreign policy with Muslim-majority nations.

That value became dramatically apparent in 1995, in the case of Sarah Balabagan: a young Filipina domestic worker in the United Arab Emirates who had been sentenced to death for killing her employer, whom she claimed had raped her.<ref name="kasama">Template:Cite web</ref> President Fidel V. Ramos, recognizing the need for a legal expert who could engage with UAE authorities on their own terms, sent Bidin to the UAE.

His ability to engage with UAE religious and legal officials on the technical merits of Islamic jurisprudence, on the doctrines of qisas (retributive justice), diyya (blood money), and pardon under Shari'ah, gave the Philippine government a set of diplomatic tools that a purely secular envoy simply would not have possessed. His involvement, as part of a broader diplomatic effort, contributed to Balabagan's eventual release, and cemented his reputation as a diplomat-jurist: a rare figure who could speak the language of international law and the language of Shari'ah with equal fluency and authority.<ref name="kasama"/>

The Cultural Weight of Being 'First'

There is a reasonable objection sometimes raised about "first" titles: that they can become substitutes for substantive progress, a way of celebrating inclusion without actually achieving it. Bidin's case challenges this objection on multiple levels. The barrier he broke had stood for nearly nine decades. The quality of his contributions to Philippine law was objectively substantial. And the community his appointment represented had been seeking recognition at this level for a very long time.

For the Bangsamoro people, Bidin's presence on the Supreme Court carried a significance that is difficult to convey from the outside.<ref name="bangsamoro_gazette_dimaampao"/> The Bangsamoro experience in the twentieth century had been marked by armed conflict, displacement, cultural marginalization, and a persistent sense of exclusion from the institutions of the Philippine state. Against this history, the appointment of a Muslim jurist from Tawi-Tawi to one of the fifteen seats on the country's highest bench was an institutional statement, imperfect and overdue, but real: that Muslim Filipinos belonged to the republic whose laws they were asked to obey.

Bidin understood and embraced this responsibility. He mentored a generation of Muslim lawyers, encouraging them to pursue careers in the national judiciary and at the Shari'ah bar.<ref name="bangsamoro_gazette_ar161">Template:Cite web</ref> He demonstrated, by sustained example, that a devout Muslim could serve at the highest level of a secular state without compromising either his faith or his professional integrity. His presence on the Court helped dismantle the stereotypes that had too long associated Muslim Filipinos primarily with armed conflict rather than legal excellence and civic participation.

The Twenty-Six-Year Gap: From Bidin to Dimaampao

When Bidin retired in April 1995, the expectation among Bangsamoro leaders and legal advocates was that his departure would prompt a renewed institutional commitment to Muslim representation on the Court. That expectation went largely unfulfilled for an extraordinary length of time. Twenty-six years passed before a second Muslim jurist would sit on the Supreme Court of the Philippines.<ref name="philstar2009"/>

The interim was not silent. Bangsamoro leaders, Muslim lawyers' organizations, and civil society actors repeatedly raised the issue, citing the 1996 Final Peace Agreement between the government and the MNLF and Republic Act No. 9054 as the legal bases for a policy of meaningful inclusion.<ref name="bangsamoro_gazette_dimaampao"/> A 2009 opinion piece in the Philippine Star, written in the context of upcoming Supreme Court vacancies, captured the accumulated frustration of that period: fourteen years after Bidin's death, still no Muslim had sat in the High Tribunal, despite explicit policy commitments and a growing pool of qualified Muslim jurists at the Court of Appeals level.<ref name="philstar2009"/>

The appointment of Japar B. Dimaampao as the 191st Associate Justice of the Supreme Court by President Rodrigo R. Duterte in September 2021 finally ended the twenty-six-year drought.<ref name="dimaampao_wiki">Template:Cite web</ref><ref name="gma_dimaampao">Template:Cite web</ref> Dimaampao, a Maranao jurist from Marawi City, Lanao del Sur, is a distinguished expert in taxation law and Shari'ah who became the Court of Appeals' youngest associate justice at forty years old, and served at the appellate level for seventeen years before his elevation to the High Court.<ref name="mindanews_dimaampao">Template:Cite web</ref> He has spoken publicly about the precedent set by Bidin, describing his predecessor as the pioneer who made his own appointment conceivable and whose example motivated him through the fourteen unsuccessful Judicial and Bar Council applications that preceded his eventual selection.<ref name="bangsamoro_gazette_ar161"/>

Together, Bidin and Dimaampao represent the entire total of Muslim justices in the history of a fifteen-member court adjudicating the affairs of a nation that includes a substantial Muslim minority population. The statistic remains a source of legitimate advocacy for Bangsamoro communities who continue to push for institutional representation commensurate with their historical presence in the Philippine nation.

Commemoration and Academic Legacy

The formal institutional recognition of Bidin's contributions is still being developed, but what exists is meaningful. The Mindanao State University College of Law, Tawi-Tawi Extension Campus, situated in his home province, has launched the "Justice Abdulwahid Bidin Lecture Series," a program that brings together legal scholars and practitioners to discuss Shari'ah, Bangsamoro law, and constitutional jurisprudence in his honor.<ref name="msu_tcto">Template:Cite web</ref> Anchored in Tawi-Tawi, his birthplace, the lecture series is a fitting tribute: a sustained academic initiative dedicated to the very intersection of legal traditions that Bidin spent his career navigating.

Beyond formal programs, Bidin's judicial record is increasingly invoked in policy discussions about strengthening the Philippine Shari'ah court system and establishing a Shari'ah Appellate Court, a reform that legal scholars and Bangsamoro legal advocates have pursued for decades.<ref name="sc_shariah_summit">Template:Cite web</ref> The Supreme Court's announcement of its first National Shari'ah Summit reflects a broader institutional movement to bring the Islamic legal dimension of the Philippine state more fully into mainstream judicial discourse, a project that Bidin's career both anticipated and legitimized.

His written decisions endure in the most practical of ways: they are taught in every Philippine law school, cited in legal briefs, and discussed in every advanced course on constitutional law and administrative law in the country. People v. Marti appears in constitutional law syllabi as the definitive Philippine case on the private search doctrine; the Marcos v. Manglapus dissent is regularly assigned to students studying the boundaries of executive power; the Dela Rosa decision surfaces in administrative law courses on citizenship and due process.<ref name="marti"/><ref name="marcos_manglapus"/><ref name="dela_rosa"/> That kind of intellectual persistence, the ongoing daily invocation of a man's reasoning by thousands of students and practitioners, is not a minor legacy. It is, in the deepest sense, legal immortality.

Death

Justice Abdulwahid A. Bidin passed away on February 2, 1999, four years after his retirement from the Supreme Court, at the age of seventy-three.<ref name="biographies_net">Template:Cite web</ref> He left behind a body of jurisprudence that continues to shape Philippine law, a generation of Muslim legal professionals he helped encourage into the profession, and a precedent, honored imperfectly and belatedly, but eventually renewed, that the nation's highest bench must be broad enough to accommodate the nation's full plurality.

The Jurist of the Crescent was not simply a milestone. He was a standard. And the standard he set, for excellence, for independence, for principled engagement with the law, remains worth building on as the Philippines continues the long, unfinished work of becoming a truly inclusive democracy.

Further Reading

- People of the Philippines v. Andre Marti, G.R. No. 81561, January 18, 1991. Full text available at LawPhil (https://lawphil.net/judjuris/juri1991/jan1991/gr_81561_1991.html).
- Marcos v. Manglapus, G.R. No. 88220, September 15, 1989. Digest available at Digest.ph (https://www.digest.ph/decisions/marcos-vs-manglapus).
- Board of Commissioners (CID) v. Dela Rosa, G.R. Nos. 95122-23, May 31, 1991. Full text available at LawPhil (https://lawphil.net/judjuris/juri1991/may1991/gr_95122_23_1991.html).
- Quraishi-Landes, Asifa. "Sources of Law, Sources of Authority: The Failure of the Philippines' Code of Muslim Personal Laws." Washington International Law Journal. University of Washington School of Law.
- "A Muslim in the Supreme Court." Philippine Star, September 22, 2009.
- "SC Associate Justice Japar Dimaampao: Second Moro Named to High Court." MindaNews, September 14, 2021.
- Bangsamoro Official Gazette. "AR-160: First Mindanaon Justice Dimaampao." Bangsamoro Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao, 2022.

See Also

- Japar B. Dimaampao
- Supreme Court of the Philippines
- Bangsamoro Organic Law
- Code of Muslim Personal Laws of the Philippines
- People v. Andre Marti
- Marcos v. Manglapus
- Sarah Balabagan
- Sulu Archipelago
- Tawi-Tawi Province
- Moro National Liberation Front
- Bangsamoro Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao
- Alpha Phi Beta
- University of the Philippines College of Law

Editorial Notice: BangsamoroPedia is a curated knowledge archive. Its pages are maintained by the editorial administrator to help ensure historical accuracy. If you would like to suggest corrections, share sources, or contribute information, please message the administrator through the official Facebook page: Notable Muslim Filipinos.

Retrieved from "https://wiki.maranaw.com/index.php?title=Abdulwahid_A._Bidin&oldid=861"