Dimapuno Alonto Datu-Ramos Jr

Dimapuno "Jun" Alonto Datu-Ramos Jr., MD, CESE, is a Maranao physician and public servant from a prominent political family in Lanao del Sur. He's best known these days as a Regional Director of the National Commission on Muslim Filipinos (NCMF), a role that capped off almost three decades of steady, patient climb through the ranks of Philippine public service. Along the way he wore a lot of hats: medical officer, spokesperson, quick response team leader, and eventually the man steering NCMF's National Capital Region office to one of the best-performing branches in the whole Commission.

Early Life and Background

Doc Jun, as most people call him, comes from the Alonto family, one of the well-known political families of Lanao del Sur. Growing up Maranao and rooted in that heritage shaped much of how he later approached his work: always with an eye toward serving the Bangsamoro people and making sure their voices reached the right rooms.

Education

Before he became a familiar name in Muslim Filipino affairs, Doc Jun built a solid academic and professional foundation. He trained and became a licensed physician, and he's also a registered nurse, giving him a rare dual footing in both medicine and healthcare administration. He went on to earn a Master's degree in Hospital Administration, and later received an honorary doctorate, a PhD "Honoris Causa" in Public Administration with a focus on Good Governance. To round things out, he also picked up a certification as

Career

Early Government Service

Doc Jun's public service career started at the ground level, working as a Medical Officer in Lanao del Sur and later with the Office of Muslim Affairs (OMA), the agency that eventually became the NCMF. That early hands-on medical work in his home province gave him a front-row seat to the health and welfare needs of Maranao communities, something that stayed with him as he moved up the ladder.

Rise Within the NCMF

As the OMA transitioned into the NCMF, Doc Jun's career transitioned right along with it. He eventually became Director for the Bureau of External Relations, a position that put him at the center of how the Commission communicated with the public and with other government bodies. He was appointed to his post by then President Benigno Aquino Jr., and was later re-appointed by President Rodrigo Roa Duterte, a mark of continuity and trust across two very different administrations.

From 2018 to the first quarter of 2022, he served as the official Spokesperson of the NCMF. During this stretch, he became known for building up the Commission's public presence, largely through a strategic and very active social media campaign. It wasn't just about visibility for its own sake either: he pushed for real transparency, helping institutionalize the NCMF's official social media accounts, its official website, a digital magazine, regular media interviews, and printed publications. He also helped put in place a formal Strategic External Communications Plan so that all of this wouldn't just depend on one person's initiative but would carry on as an actual system.

Building Institutional Systems

Beyond communications, Doc Jun had a hand in shaping how the NCMF ran internally. He organized and institutionalized the Commission's Customer Satisfaction Monitoring (CSAT) process, which involved regularly collecting, recording, and analyzing feedback data before submitting monthly reports to the Planning Service and quarterly reports to top management. He also led the creation of the NCMF's Occupational Safety and Health Committee, an initiative that looked after the welfare of NCMF's own workforce.

When the COVID-19 pandemic hit, Doc Jun stepped into an even bigger role as Vice Chairperson for Operations of the NCMF COVID-19 Quick Response Team. Under the pressure of nationwide lockdowns, the team coordinated relief operations, burial assistance, and support for stranded Muslim Filipinos who had nowhere else to turn.

His work on institutional integrity extended to finances too. He endorsed almost a million pesos in collected fees from Certificate of Tribal Membership (CTM) applications to the National Treasury, doing this before the Commission eventually announced that CTM processing would become a free service.

Regional Director, NCMF-NCR

Doc Jun currently serves as Regional Director of the NCMF-NCR Regional Office, where he's widely recognized for his contributions to Muslim Filipino communities across Metro Manila. Under his leadership, the NCMF-NCR office achieved recognition as the top 2 Best Regional Office among the Commission's 11 regions nationwide, a distinction that reflects both his management style and the team culture he built around him.

He also played a vital role, as ISO Core Team leader, in helping the NCMF secure its ISO 9001:2015 certification in 2021, a milestone that speaks to the Commission's push toward more standardized, quality-driven public service.

In recognition of his years of experience and leadership, he was included in the Portfolio Assessment for the Career Executive Service (PACES) Program through Career Executive Service Board Resolution No. 1652, and he was recognized among the career executive service graduates during the CESB's 2024 annual convention, hence the CESE distinction attached to his name.

Advocacies

Throughout his career, Doc Jun has been a consistent and vocal supporter of the Bangsamoro people and of tribal leaders across different communities. He's also been an active champion for the NCR Muslim Consultative Councils, continuously lobbying local government units to formally recognize these bodies. That advocacy bore fruit in June 2026, when Parañaque City Mayor Edwin Olivarez signed a city ordinance recognizing the councils, a concrete win for Muslim Filipino representation in the National Capital Region.

Legacy

Doc Jun's career traces an arc that's rare in Philippine bureaucracy: a licensed physician who found his true calling not just in medicine, but in the quieter, harder work of building institutions. From frontline medical officer to spokesperson to regional director, his fingerprints are on the systems, the transparency measures, and the community relationships that continue to shape how the NCMF serves Muslim Filipinos, especially in the National Capital Region.
