Pull Quote

"True leadership is measured by service to others, especially in times when they need it most."

Legacy and Character

General Akod K. Mangondato was not just known as a successful police official and community leader. He also stood as a protector of his people during times of danger.

During the years of Martial Law, when fear and unrest spread across many parts of the country, he did not hesitate to act. Together with his brother, Brigadier General Diamongen Kodaong Mangondato, PC, who was also a senior officer of the Philippine Constabulary, they used their positions and influence to rescue, assist, and protect their fellow Maranao across Mindanao.

Many families and individuals were kept safe from harm because of what they did, a reminder that true leadership is measured by service to others, especially in times when they need it most.

He completed the Al-Hadj, the sacred pilgrimage to Mecca, and throughout his life he served as a bridge of understanding between the government and the Moro community. His career also helped open the door for other Muslim officers who would go on to rise through the ranks of public service.
