Salipada Saud Tamano

Salipada Saud Tamano (also known by the honorific Kaka Ipad) was a Maranao educator, policy thinker, and institution-builder from Tugaya, Lanao del Sur, in the southern Philippines. He is recognized as one of the most consequential figures in the history of Islamic higher education in the Philippines, serving as both Dean and Chancellor of the King Faisal Center for Islamic, Arabic and Asian Studies at Mindanao State University (MSU), and later as Regional Secretary of the Department of Education, Culture and Sports of the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao (ARMM). His intellectual and administrative career spanned the principal institutional arenas of Muslim Filipino public life: the university, the regional bureaucracy, and national policy discourse on Muslim Mindanao education reform.

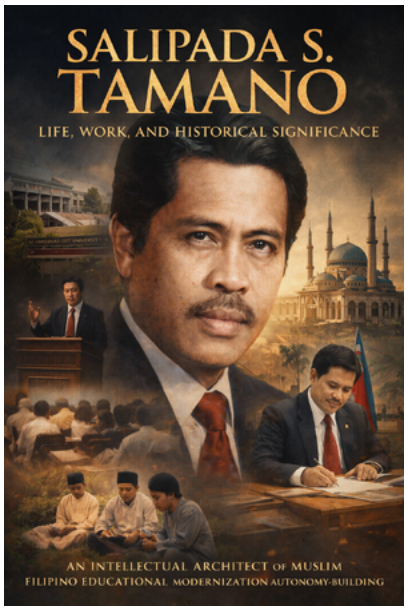

Tamano's significance in Muslim Filipino history rests less on a single dramatic act than on the cumulative reshaping of institutions — so that Muslim Filipino students, teachers, and scholars could move through them with dignity and on terms consistent with their own cultural identity. He pursued what scholars of Muslim Mindanao governance have described as institutional reformism: the transformation of existing state and academic structures to accommodate Muslim history, culture, and aspirations, rather than a wholesale rejection of those structures.<ref>Macapado A. Muslim, The Moro Armed Struggle in the Philippines: The Nonviolent Autonomy Alternative (Marawi City: Office of the President, Mindanao State University, 1994).</ref>

His published book, Educational Visions for Muslim Mindanao, issued under the ARMM Regional Department of Education, Culture and Sports, remains one of the few policy-oriented works by a Muslim Filipino educator to address systematically the integration of madrasah into the national education system.

Contents

1 Early life and background
  1.1 Tugaya and Maranao intellectual culture
2 Education and transnational formation
  2.1 Ain Shams University, Cairo
  2.2 Comparative influences
  2.3 Marriage in Cairo
3 Career at Mindanao State University
  3.1 Return to Mindanao
  3.2 King Faisal Center for Islamic, Arabic and Asian Studies

Salipada Saud Tamano

Also known as	Kaka Ipad
Born	Tugaya, Lanao del Sur, Philippines
Ethnicity	Maranao
Religion	Islam
Education	Master of Education, Ain Shams University, Cairo, Egypt
Occupation	Educator, scholar, university administrator, regional government official
Spouse	Marlene Hofer Tamano
Children	Shahlimar Hofer Tamano · Anna Marlesa Hofer Tamano-Hasim · Sadat Tamano
Institutions	Mindanao State University; ARMM-DECS
Known for	Leadership of the King Faisal Center for Islamic, Arabic and Asian Studies; madrasah integration policy; author of Educational Visions for Muslim Mindanao

3.2.1 The King Faisal Mosque as civic space
4 Published work and policy framework
4.1 Educational Visions for Muslim Mindanao
4.1.1 Madrasah integration without assimilation
4.1.2 Teacher formation and professional certification
4.1.3 Access to higher education
4.2 Curriculum as political terrain
5 Service in the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao
5.1 Establishment of the ARMM
5.2 Regional Secretary, DECS-ARMM
5.3 Administrative philosophy
6 Stance on armed conflict
7 Historical significance
7.1 Position in Muslim Filipino intellectual history
7.2 Influence on national policy
7.3 Acknowledged constraints
8 Family
8.1 Marlene Hofer Tamano
8.2 Children
9 Selected works
10 See also
11 Further reading
12 External links

Early life and background

Tugaya and Maranao intellectual culture

Salipada S. Tamano was born and raised in Tugaya, a municipality situated on the western shore of Lake Lanao in Lanao del Sur. Tugaya occupies a distinctive position in Maranao collective memory as one of the oldest centers of Maranao craftsmanship and Islamic culture. The town is most widely known for its centuries-old tradition of okir — the intricate geometric and arabesque wood-and-metal carving that distinguishes Maranao architecture, dress, and ceremonial objects — but it was equally a community in which Islamic learning and religious authority carried deep social weight.<ref>Nagasura T. Madale, The Maranao (Manila: Solidaridad Publishing House, 1997), pp. 12–34.</ref>

In Maranao society, as in Islamic societies more broadly, the scholar-leader — a figure combining religious learning with social standing — occupied a central role. Mosque-based Qur'anic instruction, oral transmission of genealogical and legal tradition, and a social ethic that valued religious knowledge shaped the character of Tugaya's communities long before any modern school was established there. This environment supplied the moral foundation for Tamano's later reform work: the conviction that to improve a people's schools is to honor their deepest values, not to displace them.

By the middle decades of the twentieth century, Maranao families of means had begun directing their most capable sons toward overseas higher education. Egypt, and Cairo in particular, had become the preferred destination, owing to the presence of Al-Azhar University — the oldest institution of higher Islamic learning in the world — and the newer state universities that combined Islamic formation with modern academic disciplines.<ref>Samuel K. Tan, Internationalization of the Bangsamoro Struggle (Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press, 1993), pp. 55–72.</ref>

Education and transnational formation

Ain Shams University, Cairo

Tamano enrolled at Ain Shams University — one of Egypt's major research universities, distinct from Al-Azhar — where he pursued a Master of Education.<ref>Ashary S. Tamano, Salipada S. Tamano: Life, Work, and Historical Significance, unpublished research manuscript (2024).</ref> His thesis examined the educational problems of Muslim Filipinos in the Philippines. Even at this early stage of his career, Muslim Filipino marginalization — its structural roots and potential remedies — was the organizing problem of his intellectual life.

Cairo in the 1960s and early 1970s was an unusually generative environment for a student interested in the relationship between Islamic education and modern statecraft. Egypt then served as a crossroads for debates reverberating across the Muslim world: about the proper relationship of religion and governance, about the compatibility of Islamic education with scientific training, and about what postcolonial nations owed their minorities and indigenous cultural institutions. Students from Southeast Asia, West Africa, and the Middle East exchanged experiences of colonization, mission education, and the struggle to recover cultural self-determination through schooling.<ref>Anthony Bubalo and Greg Fealy, Joining the Caravan? The Middle East, Islamism and Indonesia (Sydney: Lowy Institute for International Policy, 2005), pp. 1–30.</ref>

Comparative influences

Among Tamano's fellow Southeast Asian students were Malaysians and Indonesians whose countries were already experimenting with models for integrating Islamic schools into national education systems. Malaysia's expanding network of state-funded religious schools and Indonesia's pesantren tradition — boarding schools offering classical Islamic instruction alongside public school curricula — offered working examples that Islamic education and modern bureaucracy need not be treated as irreconcilable. These comparative observations would surface decades later in Tamano's arguments for a systematic, state-supported approach to madrasah integration in the Philippines.

Marriage in Cairo

In Cairo, Tamano met and married Marlene Hofer Tamano, a graduate student who later earned her own master's degree in management at Cairo University.<ref>Ashary S. Tamano, unpublished research manuscript (2024).</ref> Marlene Hofer Tamano later became a dean and faculty member at MSU and was recognized with a TOWNS Award (Ten Outstanding Women in the Nation's Service), one of the Philippines' most distinguished civic honors for professional women.

Career at Mindanao State University

Return to Mindanao

When Tamano returned to the Philippines in the early 1970s, Mindanao was entering one of the most violent and politically consequential periods of its modern history. Armed conflict between Moro secessionist movements and the Marcos government had turned vast stretches of Lanao del Sur, Maguindanao, and Cotabato into contested territory. Whole communities were displaced; schools were shuttered; the social fabric of Muslim Mindanao was under severe strain.<ref>Eliseo R. Mercado, "Culture, Economics and Revolt in Mindanao: The Origins of the MNLF and the Politics of Moro Separatism," in Armed Separatism in Southeast Asia, ed. Lim Joo-Jock and Vani S. (Singapore: Institute of Southeast Asian Studies, 1984), pp. 150–181.</ref>

Into this environment, Mindanao State University occupied a peculiar but critical position. Established on September 1, 1961, through Republic Act No. 1387, MSU had been conceived by the national government as a social laboratory for integration — a place where Filipino Muslims, Christians, and indigenous peoples could receive quality higher education and develop the mutual understanding the state hoped would contain ethnic and religious tensions in the south.<ref>Mindanao State University, Wikipedia, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Mindanao_State_University (accessed March 2026).</ref> Tamano joined MSU's academic community and rose progressively through its ranks, his Cairo credentials positioning him as precisely the kind of faculty the university needed as it sought to deepen its engagement with Islamic academic traditions.

King Faisal Center for Islamic, Arabic and Asian Studies

The centerpiece of Tamano's career at MSU was his leadership of the King Faisal Center for Islamic, Arabic and Asian Studies — an academic unit established through Saudi Arabian support and recognized as the first government institution in the Philippines to offer formal programs in Islamic and Arabic studies at the university level.<ref>Mindanao State University, Graduate Program Department – King Faisal Center for Islamic, Arabic and Asian Studies, https://www.msumain.edu.ph/graduate-program-department-kfciaas/ (accessed March 2026).</ref> He served the Center successively as Dean and Chancellor.

Tamano's leadership philosophy rejected two equally inadequate approaches: the purely devotional model, in which Islamic studies functioned as congregational religious instruction disconnected from critical inquiry; and the ornamental model, in which Arabic and Islamic programs were offered as tokens of cultural sensitivity without the faculty development, research culture, and institutional resources to render them genuinely competitive. Under his direction, the Center positioned Islamic and Arabic studies as fully academic disciplines held to the same standards of rigor as any other university subject, while remaining grounded in the classical intellectual heritage of the Islamic tradition. Faculty were encouraged to pursue advanced degrees — many of them abroad — and the Center cultivated working relationships with Middle Eastern universities providing both visiting scholar arrangements and graduate training opportunities.

The King Faisal Mosque as civic space

The King Faisal Mosque within MSU, which came under the Center's broader stewardship, served a function extending well beyond its strictly religious purpose. Under Tamano's tenure it functioned as a venue for public lectures, a meeting ground for Muslim and non-Muslim leaders, and a visible assertion that Islam had a permanent and legitimate place within Philippine public institutions.<ref>Thomas M. McKenna, Muslim Rulers and Rebels: Everyday Politics and Armed Separatism in the Southern Philippines (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998), pp. 87–112.</ref> For Muslim students and faculty who occupied a state university where cultural integration was often experienced in practice as assimilation, the mosque's presence on campus carried daily significance.

Published work and policy framework

Educational Visions for Muslim Mindanao

Tamano's most systematic intellectual contribution was committed to writing in Educational Visions for Muslim Mindanao, published under the ARMM Regional Department of Education, Culture and Sports.<ref>Salipada S. Tamano, Educational Visions for Muslim Mindanao (Cotabato City: ARMM Regional Department of Education, Culture and Sports, n.d.).</ref> The work addressed the central structural problem in Muslim Filipino education: the coexistence of two separate, largely unconnected systems — the national public school network and the network of madrasah (Islamic schools) — whose graduates could rarely move between them.

Madrasah integration without assimilation

At the heart of Tamano's argument was the position that madrasah should be integrated into the national education system without losing the religious and cultural character that gave them their purpose and community support. He rejected outright absorption — the replacement of Islamic curricula with secular ones — as a form of cultural erasure that would produce neither better education nor social peace. He was equally critical of the status quo, in which madrasah graduates found themselves unable to access higher education or stable employment because their credentials went unrecognized.<ref>Urangutan P. Pangcoga, "Islamic Education in the Philippines: Problems and Prospects," Philippine Social Sciences and Humanities Review 58, no. 1–4 (1994): 1–25.</ref>

His proposed framework had three layers:

1. Formal recognition — madrasah credentials had to be acknowledged by the state as legitimate educational qualifications.
2. Regulated standards — not to undermine madrasah autonomy, but to ensure graduates met the academic benchmarks required for educational mobility.
3. Resourcing — any integration program lacking dedicated budget lines, trained teachers, and appropriate instructional materials was doomed to remain policy on paper rather than reality in classrooms.

Teacher formation and professional certification

Tamano gave sustained attention to the preparation of teachers, arguing that no curriculum reform — however well designed — could take root without a cadre of educators trained in both Islamic content and modern pedagogical methods. His proposals included dedicated teacher-training institutes, formal certification systems for Arabic and Islamic studies teachers, and career pathways placing these educators on equivalent footing with counterparts in other subjects.

Access to higher education

The third dimension of Tamano's vision concerned pathways into university. He argued that madrasah graduates of demonstrated academic ability should be able to enter MSU and other universities' Islamic and Arabic programs directly, supported by scholarships and supplementary programs in science and mathematics where needed. This position rested on a conviction that the purpose of education — including Islamic education — was to cultivate citizens capable of full participation in national and professional life on their own cultural terms.<ref>Mehol K. Alonto, "Madrasah Education in the Philippines: Policy Dimensions and Reform Imperatives," Islam and Muslim Societies 2, no. 1 (2009): 45–67.</ref>

Curriculum as political terrain

One of Tamano's most consequential and enduring arguments concerned the political character of school curricula. He held that curricula are never neutral — that they transmit historical memory, shape moral frameworks, and communicate to children which communities and which ways of life are worthy of dignity. Philippine national curricula, designed in Manila for a predominantly Christian population, had historically transmitted a version of national history in which Muslim Filipinos appeared — when they appeared at all — as a problem to be managed rather than a community with its own centuries-long record of political organization, trade, scholarship, and governance.<ref>Cesar Adib Majul, Muslims in the Philippines (Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press, 1973), pp. 1–15.</ref>

Tamano pushed, within both MSU and the ARMM-DECS, for the substantive inclusion of Islamic Mindanao's history in regional curricula: the pre-colonial sultanates, Maranao and Maguindanao contributions to Philippine governance and literature, and the Arabic language as a living heritage language rather than a religious curiosity. He framed this not as a sectarian demand but as a prerequisite for the genuine national integration that the Philippine state claimed to want. Later national policies — particularly the Arabic Language and Islamic Values Education (ALIVE) program and the eventual formal recognition and standardization of madrasah education under the Department of Education — moved in directions consistent with Tamano's earlier advocacy.

Service in the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao

Establishment of the ARMM

The Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao was created through Republic Act No. 6734, signed by President Corazon Aquino on August 1, 1989, and ratified through a plebiscite on November 17, 1989, in which four provinces voted in favor: Lanao del Sur, Maguindanao, Sulu, and Tawi-Tawi.<ref>Republic Act No. 6734, "An Act Providing for an Organic Act for the Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao," Official Gazette of the Republic of the Philippines, https://www.officialgazette.gov.ph/1989/08/01/republic-act-no-6734/ (accessed March 2026).</ref>

Regional Secretary, DECS-ARMM

Tamano accepted the position of Regional Secretary of the Department of Education, Culture and Sports (DECS-ARMM), moving from the relative shelter of university administration into the harder terrain of regional governance.<ref>Marly Hofer-Hasim, Wikipedia, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Marly_Hofer%E2%80%93Hasim (accessed March 2026).</ref>

What he found was a system operating under severe constraint: schools damaged or destroyed during years of conflict; acute teacher shortages across the region; fiscal transfers from the national government that were neither predictable nor adequate; a bureaucratic culture poorly prepared for the planning and evaluation functions that genuine autonomy demanded; and patronage networks that complicated any attempt to make personnel and program decisions on strictly professional grounds.

Administrative philosophy

Tamano's response was what the institutional record reflects as incremental institutional consolidation — a deliberate choice to build internal capacity rather than pursue sweeping reforms that the fragile system could not sustain. He worked to clarify regional authority over curriculum, establish functioning planning and monitoring units within the DECS-ARMM, and strengthen the relationship between the regional education office and MSU, which he regarded as an indispensable technical resource for a region that lacked many of its own research and training capacities.

His handling of the madrasah question at the regional level reflected the same pragmatic gradualism. He insisted that recognition, without accompanying regulation and resourcing, was meaningless — a point he pressed repeatedly against those who regarded formal acknowledgment of madrasah credentials as an end in itself rather than a first step in a longer process. He called this inadequate alternative symbolic integration: policies that recognized institutions on paper while leaving them unfunded in practice.

Stance on armed conflict

Tamano's career unfolded during the height of Moro armed resistance against the Philippine state. He did not join armed resistance movements.<ref>W.K. Che Man, Muslim Separatism: The Moros of Southern Philippines and the Malays of Southern Thailand (Singapore: Oxford University Press, 1990).</ref>

This choice should not be read as political indifference or accommodation to state power. Tamano acknowledged, in his academic work and public addresses, that colonial governance — both Spanish and American — had systematically disrupted indigenous Muslim institutions, and that postcolonial development policy had reproduced many colonial assumptions about Muslim communities. His critique of structural exclusion was neither mild nor evasive.

His divergence from the armed movements was a difference of method, not of diagnosis. He held that the most durable form of self-determination was the one built into everyday institutions: into who teaches the children, what they are taught, which languages they learn in, and which histories they are shown. No political settlement, however favorable its terms, would produce genuine Muslim Filipino empowerment if the schools, universities, and teacher-training programs remained incapable of sustaining a Muslim Filipino scholarly and professional class. In this way, Tamano represents a non-combatant tradition of Moro resistance — struggle pursued through institutional transformation rather than armed confrontation.

Historical significance

Position in Muslim Filipino intellectual history

Salipada S. Tamano belongs to a tradition of Muslim Filipino thinkers — less visible in popular historical memory than warriors and politicians — who pursued self-determination through institutional transformation. This tradition runs from the pre-colonial ulama who built the sultanates' legal and administrative cultures through the colonial-era reformers who argued for Muslim participation in Philippine public life, to the post-war generation of educators and professionals who moved into MSU, the civil service, and eventually the autonomous regional government.

Within that lineage, Tamano occupies a specific niche: the scholar-bureaucrat who could move with equal fluency between the world of Islamic academic tradition and the world of modern educational administration. This dual competence allowed him to translate an Islamic educational vision into the language of curricular standards, budget lines, and institutional policy — something neither pure administrators nor pure religious scholars could do alone.

By framing Muslim Filipino marginalization as a structural and policy problem amenable to structural and policy solutions — rather than as an inevitable consequence of cultural difference — Tamano contributed to a gradual repositioning of Muslim Filipinos in national discourse: less as a problem to be managed, more as partners whose educational development was a national responsibility and a national interest.<ref>Patricio N. Abinales, Making Mindanao: Cotabato and Davao in the Formation of the Philippine Nation-State (Manila: Ateneo de Manila University Press, 2000), pp. 185–222.</ref>

Influence on national policy

Later national education policies — the ALIVE program, the formal recognition and standardization of madrasah education under the Department of Education, and the curriculum localization frameworks adopted in the Bangsamoro Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao (BARMM) — moved in directions that Tamano had been advocating for decades. He belongs to the category of foundational thinkers whose influence enters policy through slow intellectual pressure rather than direct attribution.

Acknowledged constraints

A balanced assessment of Tamano's career must acknowledge what his reform work did not fully achieve. Madrasah mainstreaming in the Philippines remains incomplete. Madrasah quality across BARMM varies considerably. Teacher shortages persist. The certification and professional development pipeline he envisioned has been constructed only partially and unevenly. Budget allocations for Islamic and Arabic education remain subject to annual political negotiation rather than structural guarantee.

These gaps reflect the structural difficulties of changing institutions shaped by decades of underfunding, political patronage, and the ongoing effects of armed conflict — not the inadequacy of Tamano's intellectual framework.

Family

Marlene Hofer Tamano

Tamano's wife, Marlene Hofer Tamano, built her own distinguished career at MSU, serving as a dean and receiving the TOWNS Award (Ten Outstanding Women in the Nation's Service) — a recognition reserved for Filipino women who have made exceptional contributions to their professions and communities. She earned her master's degree in management at Cairo University.

Children

- Shahlimar Hofer Tamano — serves as Undersecretary of the Department of Tourism of the Philippines, holding concurrent responsibilities for Tourism Regulation, Coordination and Resource Generation, and serving also as the department's Chief of Staff. His career has included service as regional director for Regions VII and XII and international representation of Philippine tourism interests in forums from India to Japan.<ref>Department of Tourism, Republic of the Philippines, Key Officials, https://beta.tourism.gov.ph/key-officials/ (accessed March 2026).</ref>

- Anna Marlesa Hofer Tamano-Hasim — a physician (Ob-Gyn) known publicly as Doc Marly Hofer-Hasim, elected in 2025 as Representative of the 2nd Congressional District of Zamboanga Sibugay in the 20th Congress of the Philippine House of Representatives, taking her seat on June 30, 2025. On her first day in office, she filed legislation including a bill to convert the municipality of Ipil into a city.<ref>House of Representatives of the Philippines, Member Profile: Hon. Anna Marlesa "Doc Marly" Hofer-Hasim, https://www.congress.gov.ph/house-members/view/?member=L045 (accessed March 2026).</ref>

- Sadat Tamano — completed training at the Philippine Military Academy and pursued a career in military service.

Selected works

- Tamano, Salipada S. Educational Visions for Muslim Mindanao. Cotabato City: ARMM Regional Department of Education, Culture and Sports, n.d.
- Tamano, Salipada S. The Educational Problems of the Muslims in the Philippines. Master of Education thesis, Ain Shams University, Cairo, Egypt.

See also

- Mindanao State University
- King Faisal Center for Islamic, Arabic and Asian Studies
- Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao
- Bangsamoro Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao
- Madrasah education in the Philippines
- Arabic Language and Islamic Values Education
- Moro people
- Maranao people
- Tugaya, Lanao del Sur
- Marly Hofer-Hasim
- Shahlimar Hofer Tamano

Further reading

- Mamitua Saber, MAJORITY-MINORITY IN SITUATION IN THE PHILIPPINES , Mindanao Journal: Volume 1, No. 1 (July-September 1974) (https://msu-mindanaojournal.com/index.php/ojs/article/view/68)
- Mamitua Saber, Salipada Tamano, MUSLIM COTABATO, SAMPLING OF SOCIAL AND CULTURAL TRAITS , Mindanao Journal: Volume 12, No. 1-4 (1985 - 1986) (https://msu-mindanaojournal.com/index.php/ojs/article/view/283)
- Mamitua Saber, Salipada Tamano, MARANAO TRADITIONAL SOCIETY AND GOVERNMENT , Mindanao Journal: Volume 12, No. 1-4 (1985 - 1986) (https://msu-mindanaojournal.com/index.php/ojs/article/view/281)
- Mamitua Saber, Salipada Tamano, MUSLIM MINDANAO: THE COMMUNITY UNDER STUDY , Mindanao Journal: Volume 12, No. 1-4 (1985 - 1986) (https://msu-mindanaojournal.com/index.php/ojs/article/view/279)
- Mamitua Saber, Salipada Tamano, RECOMMENDATION: "NEW DEAL" IN MUSLIM AFFAIRS , Mindanao Journal: Volume 12, No. 1-4 (1985 - 1986) (https://msu-mindanaojournal.com/index.php/ojs/article/view/285)
- Mamitua Saber, Salipada Tamano, MUSLIM LANAO: REGION OF SAMPLE COMMUNITIES , Mindanao Journal: Volume 12, No. 1-4 (1985 - 1986) (https://msu-mindanaojournal.com/index.php/ojs/article/view/280)
- Mamitua Saber, Salipada Tamano, THE RESEARCH PROBLEM (https://msu-mindanaojournal.com/index.php/ojs/article/view/278) , Mindanao Journal: Volume 12, No. 1-4 (1985 - 1986) (https://msu-mindanaojournal.com/index.php/ojs/issue/view/33)
- McKenna, Thomas M. Muslim Rulers and Rebels: Everyday Politics and Armed Separatism in the Southern Philippines. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.

- Majul, Cesar Adib. Muslims in the Philippines. Quezon City: University of the Philippines Press, 1973.
- Abinales, Patricio N. Making Mindanao: Cotabato and Davao in the Formation of the Philippine Nation-State. Manila: Ateneo de Manila University Press, 2000.
- Che Man, W.K. Muslim Separatism: The Moros of Southern Philippines and the Malays of Southern Thailand. Singapore: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Buendia, Rizal G. "The State-Moro Armed Conflict in the Philippines: Unresolved National Question or Question of Governance?" Asian Journal of Political Science 13, no. 1 (2005): 109–138.
- Apple, Michael W. Ideology and Curriculum. 3rd ed. New York: Routledge, 2004.

External links

- King Faisal Center for Islamic, Arabic and Asian Studies – MSU Main Campus (https://www.msumain.edu.ph/graduate-program-department-kfciaas/)
- Marly Hofer-Hasim – Wikipedia (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Marly_Hofer%E2%80%93Hasim)
- Republic Act No. 6734 – Official Gazette of the Philippines (https://www.officialgazette.gov.ph/1989/08/01/republic-act-no-6734/)

Editorial Notice: BangsamoroPedia is a curated knowledge archive. Its pages are maintained by the editorial administrator to help ensure historical accuracy. If you would like to suggest corrections, share sources, or contribute information, please message the administrator through the official Facebook page: Notable Muslim Filipinos.

Retrieved from "https://wiki.maranaw.com/index.php?title=Salipada_Saud_Tamano&oldid=1151"